Many professionals who have successful careers often share that they would not have gotten there without the advice and guidance of other wiser people. These people act as their mentors, supporting them in developing new skills, navigating political environments, challenging ideas, and expanding networks. Nevertheless, mentoring does not always guarantee success as it depends on the mentor, the mentee as well as their mentoring relationship. In this plenary, the benefits of mentoring, the essential elements, and other influencing factors for its success such as gender and organizational context are discussed.
